Added a new category for Empire Hunts to Fireteams. Fixed a crash in Bounties while using the app in Italian. Now shows Stasis subclasses in Fireteams. This app is absolutely great. For me worth 5 stars. Everything that you can do in the app from being able to move items from your vault to any character of your in-game, to staying in touch with your clan, finding other players playing this game for help with certain activities or endgame content, to updates that Bungie gives us about the game, and so much more. Some things I would consider adding to this app but would be, to be able to show the quest progress on it. Instead of having to upload the pursuits screen while I'm in the middle of an activity to see how close I am to finishing a quest, it can be as simple as viewing it on the app. Another thing, being able to buy gifts from vendors through the app, (and really just bounties to prevent players from not having to go to that certain provider about other things like pursuits) but preventing them from having to waste time goes all the way to making some seller just for a bounty before starting a business related to whatever bounty it is that they need. I feel like maybe some changes like this could really take this app to a whole other level of amazing. So I was never a big of PC game companions like this, being able to make adjustments chatting on the fly is not that appealing to me because I never felt the need for. What really does app awesome are 3D models. Destiny doesn't allow you to view your weapons from 360 degrees, which is something that players I want to do! We've wanted it for years! Tell me when you get a god roll the first thing you do is not admire that thing? You're in trouble. This is so awesome, now I can completely determine if a gun is ugly or not. From a single angel to the in-game menu sometimes it's hard to say what makes your gun look like. If some effects like changing magazine or burning could be added I would give you six stars. It's also fun to be able to mess with my load out and gear no matter where I am. I admit it. The user interface of this app is definitely missing. Example: When I receive messages about Clan Chat messages and click notification, I am not taken to Clan Chat where the message came in I have had to figure out on my own that I have to manually go to Clan Chat to see where the notification came from. It should be the UI 101 mobile app. Especially when Bungie is promoting D2's clan oriented features to encourage cooperative play. The same goes for all other features of the app, such as LFG. The second issue I see is that Bungie took out the very useful PvP statistics we used to have in the Destiny 1 companion app version. Now I have to take to 3rd party web apps to find this info; and it's clearly not as ideal as what Bungie is already offered in the old version of their companion app. So if new Clan features aren't really all that ideal to begin with, why did they get rid of old functionality that did work and was actually useful? Read more Developer Website App Support Privacy Policy With or without the help of developer Bungie, Destiny 2's community has always gone to great lengths to help those in need and find new ways for players to come together in the game. From community-driven puzzle-solving to the latest Exotic weapons quest to create sites like DestinyLFG.net or/r/Fireteams to helping players find groups for Raids, Nightfall Strikes, Exotic Quests or just to make new friends for a few nights a week, there's nothing on how far Destiny players will go. And slowly over the years, Bungie has tried to help as much as it can through the Destiny Companion App, offering quick access to the Vault, switching to a new loadout, and news, statistics or milestones. Start Now After the launch of Destiny 2: bungie made some changes in how it approaches seasonal seasonal activities Like Solor and have given players an entry-level difficulty while continuing to offer a Legend (Hard Mode) variant for endgame level loot rewards. With so many different weekly milestones to grind out, the Destiny 2 Companion App has become one of the easiest ways for players to be able to find groups quickly and invite them through the console, to the point that it is now a must have App for both hardcore and casual players in 2020. Available to download on iOS and Android stores, players can log into the Destiny 2 Companion App via their Bungie account which is linked to PSN, Xbox and Steam, and instantly have access to characters, Pursuits, Triumphs, Collections, Vault, and more. The complementary app can be used to access Bungie's weekly news updates, Bungie Rewards, allowing players to switch weapons and gear between characters or the vault on the fly, and as a messaging app for Clans. While all that is mentioned is good to have and useful for players, the main feature is the integrated LFG section, Fireteams. For years players have been forced to go to external sites like DestinyLFG or/r/Fireteams to find groups to run a Raid or Nightfall because, without a clan, Bungie simply doesn't offer players any alternative options. The Fireteams section is not from a new update, it's been around for a long time, but with the constant addition of new activities, especially activities like Sundial on Legend difficulties that do not offer matchmaking despite not requiring the level of communication that a Raid does, Fireteams is an easy-to-use LFG option. By default, Fireteams will open on a list set to all activities and advertise the latest requests submitted on which platform the app is signed in. Specific activities can be selected by tapping the 'All Activities' drop-down menu at the top and adjusting the language and platform through settings in the upper right corner. Joining a FireTeam is pretty easy because players can automatically add themselves if there is a seat available and just have to wait for the game to invite to come through from the host. On the other hand, creating a Fireteam requires only players to select the Activity, their character, and platform selection, and whether a mic is required or not. The main reason that destiny 2 companion app is a must and a good alternative to external LFG websites comes down to its integration with the player's Bungie account and system. For example, when a PS4 Fireteam is full, the host can turn on the 'Send Invite' button at the bottom of the screen and the group will receive an in-game invite on their PS4 to join the game. There is no need to go to an external website, chat with groups before approving or denying the request, then wait for the invite to be manually sent on PS4, Xbox or PC. Instead, everything is already set up one can be done in a few clicks all through their mobile phone. While the vast majority of in Destiny 2 has integrated and automatically sort players into a Fireteam, a common complaint that has existed since Destiny 1 is endgame activities like Raids. Difficult activities that require a full Fireteam and constant communication don't have matchmaking makes sense and so the community went on to build incredible tools to get around it just as Bungie has thought. But not all activities are easy to find and invite players to and not all activities need quite as many limitations such as Sundial Legend difficulties that do not have matchmaking despite being quite similar in difficulty to the standard model. Bungie has succeeded in creating an effective LFG system within destiny companion app that is incredibly easy to use and meets a wide range of needs. Players can search for Raids or Exotic Quests and indicate whether mics are required or not, send an invitation directly through the platform for selection and have players on their Fireteam at the touch of a button. It's an incredibly easy way to quickly find a Fireteam to knock out the weekly milestone without ever having to think about anything but the location of their phone.
